

About the Book

Frederick Manfred. The Golden Bowl. 1944, reprint Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1976.

Synopsis

Written under the pen name of Feike Feikema, The Golden Bowl — Manfred's first novel — established his reputation as a regional author and remains perhaps the best of his almost two-dozen novels. Based upon his own hitch-hiking journey across South Dakota in 1934, after graduating from college, the book narrates the story of Maury Grant who is a “tumbling tumbleweed,” always looking for a job on the distant horizon until he settles down to establish roots on the land in the area just east of the Badlands. Similar in tone to John Steinbeck's Grapes of Wrath, Manfred's dust bowl saga stands as one of the most iconic books ever written about South Dakota life and culture.

Summary of the Book

Originally published in 1944 under the pen name of Feike Feikema, The Golden Bowl, Frederick Manfred's first novel, received glowing notices from reviewers and launched Manfred's literary career on a high note. He followed it the next year with Boy Almighty and two years after that with This Is the Year, eventually writing twenty-two novels as well as a number of other works of fiction and nonfiction. The New York Times called the book “a timeless account of man's battle against nature and the gains measured only in the integrity of his own soul.” Sewanee Review likened it to a kind of folk ballad, “another lyric performance, a dexterous biography of the elemental forces which threaten the pioneer.” The reviewer for The Listener of London weighed in, “This is a comfortable and beautiful novel, achieving unpretentious perfection in its little field, and I'd prefer it to half a dozen howling Wolfes or straining Steinbecks.”

The 6'9" Manfred, in fact, was often compared to the wide-girthed Thomas Wolfe, whose massive autobiographical novels, comparable in volume to his own out-sized physique, won him widespread notice and fame before his premature death at thirty-seven in 1938. Much more relevant, John Steinbeck won acclaim for The Grapes of Wrath, another dust bowl adventure, published a half-decade before Manfred's contribution to the field. The Minnesota novelist indeed had read Grapes before publishing his own book, but only after having gone through three or four drafts, with three or four more being completed before The Golden Bowl finally came out in print in 1944. Both books dealt with the environmental and economic disaster of the Dust Bowl and Great Depression, empathized with the victims of the debacle, and sympathized with New Deal-type reforms aimed at ameliorating the conditions resulting from the breakdown. But Manfred's was a much shorter, sparer, stripped-down, and simple narrative. Where Steinbeck was a "putter-inner," Manfred was a "taker-outer" (more like Hemingway in this regard).

While Steinbeck sold many more copies and won much greater renown for his books (eventually capturing a Nobel Prize for Literature), Manfred won a substantial and enthusiastic following of his own, especially in the area around where he was born and lived all his life: northwest Iowa, southwest Minnesota, southeast South Dakota, and Northeast Nebraska. Indeed, he would set almost all of his stories in this region, and he concocted his own special name for it, "Siouxland," which he started using in 1947 in This Is the Year. Manfred observed that in writing his novels his greatest discovery was that all great writers are regionalists. He was simply following the rule most writers put at or near the top of their list of "do's and don't's": "Write about what you know." Despite his close association with the Upper Midwest, however, he told one interviewer, "I am no more conscious of being a western writer than Homer was of being a Greek or Hardy a Wessex Englishman or Tolstoi a Russian or Faulkner a Mississippi Southern. I just happened to be born here; I like it here; and by great good luck it also happens to be one helluva wonderful place to live in." Like many, if not most, other writers, Manfred considered the themes he addressed in his writing to be universal ones.

Though a first novel, The Golden Bowl evidenced a sure control of its material, kept its readers turning the page, demonstrated a mature sense of craft, and remains one of the author's most highly regarded works. While lacking a complex plot, it had a compelling story to tell. Its protagonist, Maury Grant, was a sort of Odysseus figure — the prototypical traveler looking for a better life for himself and in search of his true identity. It is his character that changes most during the course of the novel, and it is his troubles, dreams, adventures, ups, and downs that we are interested in learning about. We are not surprised to discover that the inspiration for the book's writing was a trip the new college graduate, Fred Manfred, took hitchhiking across South Dakota, Montana, and Wyoming in 1934, the same year that the novel begins, and perhaps the worst year of the drought and dust storms in South Dakota. Crop reporting figures revealed that the food grain production index that year was 4 (normal output being 100). Cattle and other farm animals were dying right and left, farm foreclosures were rife, the percentage of South Dakotans on government relief rolls (39%) topped the nation, and thousands of families were leaving in their jalopies for California (just like their more famous counterparts, the “Okies,” chronicled by John Steinbeck in The Grapes of Wrath). Readers should understand that none of the hardships and ecological disasters described in The Golden Bowl were in any way exaggerated. Manfred had seen it all through his own eyes in his wanderings across the state, and the narrative he wrote about it later was accurate in every detail, if delivered in fictionalized form.

The first few pages of the book establish the contours of place, specifically the Thor farm, located twenty miles east of the Badlands. Following the route of the Atlantic-Yellowstone-Pacific Highway (Manfred had hitchhiked along Highway 16, which is the route of present-day I-90), Maury Grant witnesses how the topography, rainfall, and soil differed the further west he went. Manfred expands his purview by placing geography within historical context, briefly sketching changes in the flora, fauna, and human presence over millennia — even millions of years' time. But while the context for his story is immense — even cosmic — the focus is always tight and circumscribed. There really isn't a lot of social context; most of the action occurs in the travels of Maury and in his interactions with the Thor family. A quick perusal of the local newspapers of the period, or, say, a book like Paula Nelson's The Prairie Winnows Out its Own: The West River Country of South Dakota in the Years of Depression and Dust (1996), would reveal that a vital and complex set of social institutions and activities provided a more complicated picture of the area than the spare one presented in Manfred's novel. However, he was not aiming at verisimilitude as much as a deeper truth about the aspirations and dreams of people on the land, the adversities they faced, and the degree to which they were able to transcend the limits facing them.

Central themes worth paying attention to include: (1) the Dust Bowl and the environmental disaster posed by the drought and dust storms of the 1930's; (2) governmental efforts, primarily those initiated by the New Deal, to ameliorate environmental and economic conditions; (3) the peripatetic wanderings of hoboes, transients, migrant laborers — call them what you will — during the period; (4) social and economic conflict between owners, businessmen, and law enforcement officials, on the one side, and tramps, workers, destitute farmers, and union organizers, on the other; (5) the ultimate triumph of settlers on the land over adverse climatic conditions; (6) the impact of history on people's lives; (7) the lure of the “American Dream” and the question of whether it would endure; (8) discovering one's personal identity; (9) a love story featuring Maury and Kirsten; (10) the resoluteness and survival of Pa and Ma Thor; and (11) the perpetual tension between a desire to roam and be free as against a search for roots and rootedness in the land.

That last theme is personified by the Thors, on the one hand, with their decision to stay put on their acreage despite all odds and predictions, and Maury, on the other, whose main desire is to get away from farming and the land and to roam free and find fulfillment in an elusive job that he never is able to find before the story ends. Pa Thor tells him that the job he's looking for is always “100 miles ahead of him,” and Maury finally discovers that this is true. By the end of the book, he has come to realize that the happiness he desires, the “American Dream” he has pursued, and the freedom he has elevated to his highest goal will best be found back with Kirsten and her parents on their hard-scrabble farm in the heart of the Dust Bowl. The end of the book brings no promise of riches, contentment, or even modest success, but it does deliver hope, and until this time, that is something that has been lacking in Maury. There is enough substance to the expectation to suffice in a land where the dwellers view the place they live as “next year country.”
